Kids who have faced strong, frequent and/or prolonged adversity, as well as collective traumas like racism and community violence without supportive adults in their lives, can experience toxic stress.

Young people don't usually misbehave just to break the rules. As a coach, identifying the context of your players' behavior will set both of you up for success.

Personal experiences and trauma directly impact how kids show up at our practices.

Kids who have faced strong, frequent and/or prolonged adversity, as well as collective traumas like racism and community violence without supportive adults in their lives, can experience toxic stress.

This excessive activation of the stress-response system can lead to long-lasting wear and tear on the body and brain. As a result, kids often exhibit effects of serious trauma exposure, such as the inability to control impulses, aggression and a heightened sense of fear.

What does this look like for a kid playing sports?

- A minor foul escalates into a fight with teammates
- A lack of focus
- The inability to handle competitive pressure

Follow us on social and visit coachingcorps.org for more resources.
UNDERSTANDING TRAUMA'S IMPACT ON BEHAVIOR

THE GAME PLAN

While these behaviors can be frustrating from a coaching perspective, we encourage you to remember two essential components in supporting kids:

- Always assume kids' disruptive behavior is the symptom of a deeper harm
- For kids to manage their behaviors and emotions, they need support from a regulated adult.

Coaches Can:

- Identify their own triggers and have strategies to regulate themselves
- Listen deeply to understand players' perspectives
- Ask "looking back" questions to help kids name previous emotions
- Help kids identify new responses to behavior and emotions

3. The Boy Who Was Raised As A Dog Bruce Perry, ME, PHD and Maia Szalavitz (2017)

Follow us on social and visit coachingcorps.org for more resources